AUSTIN — A Texas senator is proposing to eliminate a state program that penalizes drivers for traffic violations and accidents.

The Senate Responsibility Program (SRP), which has been heavily criticized for the financial burden it places on those affected, would be repealed under a bill considered before the Senate Finance Committee on Thursday.

Known as the “points system,” the program adds, witholding penalties to drivers who commit a moving violation. Drivers who commit two moving violations in a 12-month period get two “points” on their driver’s license, and three if the violation results in a car crash.

Points stay on a license for three years and if a license incumbent earns 12 points, the driver license is suspended for one year at the end of the year. That fine grows up to $12 for every additional point above six.

Nationwide, additional charges for more serious violations — $800 for a driver’s first intoxicated driving conviction and increasing for each subsequent conviction, driving with a suspended or invalid license and evading arrest with a ...
